This record of publications reports research relating to the study of antiquity by academics in Australian and New Zealand Universities in 2018. The most complete collection of such data, it is evidence for the significant and diverse research interests which animate the field in our region and beyond. The list shows scholars from Australia and New Zealand participating actively in lively and wide-ranging academic conversations in areas such as ancient history (up to late antiquity and Byzantium), ancient philosophy, ancient religion, archaeology, art history, Egyptology, languages and literature, and reception studies (including relating study of the ancient world to contemporary society and the indigenous cultures of Australia and Aotearoa New Zealand). Scholars also publish on best-practice pedagogy. Scholarly outlets cover significant national and international publishers and journals across all areas of ancient world studies.

Publications are arranged under the following categories: a) monographs (25, up from 17 in 2017); b) edited books (18, up from 15 in 2017); c) journal articles (126, up from 93); and, d) book chapters (144, up from 102 in 2017, including refereed conference papers and encyclopedia articles). Non-refereed works are not included, since the focus is on research publications. This misses significant contributions to the disciplines (for example through scholarly reviews or keynote lectures) and also wider community engagement activities (for example through blog posts, podcasts, and films aimed at a general audience, and publications which support professional development of teachers). Those interested in such engagement, service, and impact activities should consult the bi-annual ASCS Newsletter, which records many such activities.

Publications are included from scholars working in the following universities: Adelaide, Auckland, Australian Catholic, Australian National, Canterbury, La Trobe, Macquarie, Massey, Melbourne, Monash, New England, Otago, Queensland, Sydney, Tasmania, Western Australia, and Victoria, Wellington. Apologies to any researchers whose research has inadvertently been omitted. Many thanks to the ASCS Campus Representatives who helped to collate this data.
